

While considering households, let us not forget the cases where the woman of the house, although a homemaker, does little to nothing in particular regarding housework or child rearing. Again, there remains the question of identifying the hours of multitasking where a woman is bound to take care of cooking, cleaning and taking care of her child.

because the short end of the stick of not considering housework from the beginning falls on the women. Their housework is ultimately 'equated' to the unemployed, the beggars and other non-contributing organisms in the society. A day, or week or even months cannot change this societal mindset. If you consider yourself a functional adult, then stand with the homemaker in your home,

Or is it better to value those at the wages generally paid to the help?

When it comes to national policy making and awareness, the path is murky and filled with any and all obstacles imaginable. Women are already subjected to an astounding amount of bias and social oppression in physical, verbal and psychological forms. Adding this particular issue needs to be addressed in both socio-economic and financial context.

While considering households, let us not forget the cases where the woman of the house, although a homemaker, does little to nothing in particular regarding housework or child rearing. Again, there remains the question of identifying the hours of multitasking where a woman is bound to take care of cooking, cleaning and taking care of her child. Adding the monetary value and addressing the extra hours which women spend compared to their male counterparts is only the beginning. Women empowerment lies hand in hand with financial power and it is high time to acknowledge the unpaid activities as solid savings to a family.

Western corporate culture has become our bread and butter for a fast track career route. The business attire, the corporate talk, the executive meetings are all being integrated into our service sector. Why not take up some of the positive Western household customs as well? What can be so very wrong if the husband has to do his share of cleaning the living room floor? Will the fabric of society crumble if the eldest son of the house does the dishes every alternate day? And it is not a matter of just giving the wife some 'pocket money' which can lessen the severity of the issue.

for she has no one but herself to stand with.

Women are mentioned more and more

By Iris Farina
Photo: LS Archive/Sazzad Ibne Sayed
 Visit www.facebook.com/equality.through.dignity to stay updated on their campaigns.