JAMAL KHASHOGGI 'KILLING' Probe focus on Saudi prince's inner circle

CNN ONLINE

Turkish investigators wearing hazmat suits searched the Saudi consul general's residence in Istanbul yesterday, looking for clues to what happened to Jamal Khashoggi amid growing indications that the men allegedly responsible for the journalist's death have close ties to the highest levels of the Saudi government.

Sources told CNN that a group of Saudi men whom Turkish officials believe are connected to Khashoggi's apparent killing were led by a high-ranking intelligence officer, with one source saying he was close to the inner circle of the kingdom's Crown Prince Mohammed bin Salman.

Khashoggi, a Washington Post columnist, visited the Saudi consulate in Istanbul on October 2 to obtain papers that would have allowed him to marry his Turkish fiancée. The insider-turned-critic of the Saudi government has not been seen since.

Turkish officials have told CNN that Khashoggi's body was dismembered after he was killed in the consulate.

Turkish investigators carried out a lengthy search of the consulate on Monday but were only allowed access to the consul general's residence in Istanbul for the first time on

#METOO FALLOUT MJ Akbar quits, to challenge accusations

REUTERS, New Delhi

An Indian government minister resigned yesterday, saying he was doing so in order to fight accusations of sexual harassment levied by several women, the most high-profile casualty of a growing #MeToo movement.

More than a dozen women have accused MJ Akbar, a junior foreign minister, of a range of inappropriate behaviour during his career as a journalist before entering politics.

He has denied the accusations and filed a lawsuit against one of the women for defaming him. Twenty other women have since offered to testify against him.

"Since I have decided to seek justice in a court of law in my personal capacity, I deem it appropriate to step down from office and challenge false accusations levied against me in a personal capacity," the news agency ANI, a Reuters partner,

Robot talks to MPs about future of AI

AFP, London

A walking and talking robot appeared in Britain's parliament for the first time on Tuesday, prompting Twitter users to seize the chance to heap more mockery on Theresa May.

The latest round of public amusement at the expense of the British premier came during a committee hearing on artificial intelligence (AI) and "the fourth industrial revolution".

MPs on the education committee invited a robot named Pepper -- a white female creation with an excruciatingly thin waist and a tablet computer stuck to her chest -- to answer some basic questions.

Asked whether humans would have a place in a brave new world where AI reigns supreme, Pepper responded in a reassuring voice.

"Robots will have an important role to play, but we will always need the soft skills that are unique to

INDIAN SC RULING No time limit for reporting sexual abuse of children

OUR CORRESPONDENT, New Delhi

India's law ministry has opined that there is no time limit for reporting offences of child sexual abuse.

Following the opinion, Minister for Women and Child Development Maneka Sanjay Gandhi said, "...now any victim, at any age, can complain about sexual abuse faced by him/her as a child and report the cases under The Protection of Children from Sexual Offences Act (POCSO), Act 2012."
