

In most of the 'I want simplicity' cases, the bride and the groom resort to a single hue, rather than a multitude of colours. Does it mean they prefer a true monochrome ensemble? A play of black or white? Maybe not! Because how many times have we heard the elders warn us to not wear white or black to a wedding to ward off the superstitious connotations? So the way out-- a single hued palette that looks equally gorgeous!

MAGIC in Monochrome

agent without guilt! So how can someone who's all in for depleting money on such a special occasion, incorporate the elan of monochrome?

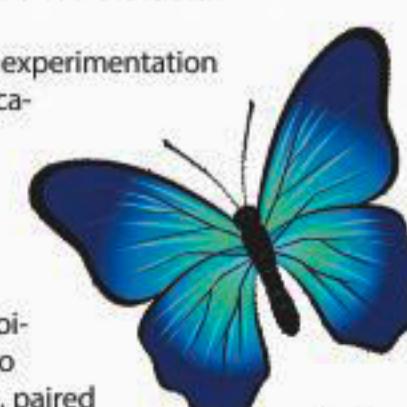

The answer lies in the closest associates - a.k.a. the bridesmaids, the groom's friends, the aunts, the uncles, and the countless cousins.

Each of the categories can be assigned a special colour of their own. Worn in a combination, they should look like the dazzling colours of a rainbow.

The photographs come out superbly fit as well, and everyone recognises what their relation with the bride or the groom is!

So, no longer do you have to be bothered by lines like - "How are you related to the bride?" One glance at your colour code and they would know your exact association. Isn't that a great relief! Phew!

On an end note, monochrome affinity or not, it certainly meets all tastes perfectly!

Are we in a rush to leave behind the segment 'who likes it gorgeous' and 'all-the-way beyond' on their special day?

Not at all! Because this special affair, which hopefully comes once in a lifetime for most, allows everyone the opportunity to be extrav-

A simple sari in a yellow tone or pearl pink can highlight the inner being. Our belief is that, often, the person gets lost in the weight of the wedding hustle, or should we say the weight of the lehenga! And the easiest way to bounce back is to wear anything in a single hue, where the persona behind the individual is highlighted and a happy soul lightens up the face instead of an expensive wardrobe.

Too bold maybe?

Well for starters, maybe experimentation can be done on smaller occasions like the mehndi or the holi night, rather than the main day.

Instead of wearing clothes with plenitude of embellishments and embroidery, the bride can resort to wearing something simple, paired with minimal jewellery and makeup.
