

Card games that aren't UNO

FAIZA ADIL

Don't get me wrong, UNO is a great game. There are a million other games you could play using those cards, but it does get a little repetitive sometimes. Card games are easy to pull out whenever boredom strikes or conversations dull and carrying colossal board games with you everywhere you go isn't exactly practical. But what is there to play besides UNO?

MONOPOLY DEAL

It's not as long and frustrating as it sounds. Sure, Monopoly is a bit of a make-or-break-your-relationship kind of game, and so is Monopoly Deal. While it promises to be a fast game that you can finish in just fifteen minutes, you probably won't want to once you get the hang of it. Monopoly Deal is a card version of the board game with property cards, money cards, house cards, chance cards, etc. It's a significantly smaller game than its original counterpart but just as satisfying when you ask for rent and buy property. If only it were that easy in reality.

FORGET THAT!

We've all played a bunch of 'would-you-rathers' and alarming truth questions in truth or dare. There's a lot of weird and fascinating questions that we don't ask our friends. Forget That! is a card game that asks the questions you wouldn't even think to ask and lets you guess the answers to them. Each round one player asks a question from the cards and everyone else attempts to guess the answers. It comes with a lot of odd questions that get you thinking about scenarios you'd never naturally imagine.

CARDS AGAINST HUMANITY

Almost everyone has heard of this one by now but if you haven't yet, you're missing out on something hilarious. Cards Against Humanity is a contemporary card game that revolves around a whole bunch of random, agreeably funny white cards and equally jarring black cards. Ranging from weird to borderline offensive, the combinations that you can come up with depend solely on your sense of humor. The only way to win this game is to be witty and funny.

Now that you have three more card games to try out, your bland days out can easily be made a tad bit more entertaining. With all of that aside, it's important to mention that there's always a simple deck of cards to fool around with and endless ways to play.

The ultimate millennial traveller starter pack

VERONICA GOMES

If you think you have what it takes to be called a traveller, think again. To become the best of the best, you first need to re-evaluate and cross off certain must-haves. So buckle up and prepare to have a revelation.

First, you need to improve your Instagram game. The bio needs to have the "Earth" and "Plane" emojis aligned next to each other, with the inevitable presence of the words "Suffering from wanderlust" lingering at the very beginning. Your feed should be filled with picturesque landscapes, some of which you have downloaded from the internet but it doesn't matter because you've travelled to these places inside your head and your version of reality is the only one that's relevant. If you suffer from travel hiatus, be sure to keep reposting old travel photos at least twice a day to assert dominance of your travelling self.

Next you need to establish your superior travel stance in life by talking about it relentlessly. For instance boasting about your "post-trip depression" after coming back from KORT. Remember, you are your biggest fan, so be sure to never shy away from indulging in conversations about yourself. Make sure to repeat the same travel stories you have from the grand total of three domestic trips you've been throughout your life as repetition is key to being remembered.

In order to truly leave a mark, you need to constantly remind the people around you about the fact that you have been on a few more trips than they have and that makes you a winner. Life is a competition and whoever said they're not keeping count is definitely keeping count. Be sure to always stay one trip ahead from the rest and when all else fails, just stay away from people who have travelled more than you. Don't need that kind of negativity in your life.

Lastly, you can't possibly become the best without imparting your superior travel knowledge to your inferior travel aspirants. Whenever you get a whiff of someone planning a trip, be sure to present them with your travel tips, even if you don't know half of what you're talking about. Help these poor souls by providing your invaluable assistance even if it doesn't make sense in terms of cost, comfort and overall quality.
