'Voters trusted my manifesto'

New CCC mayor Rezaul Karim Chowdhury speaks to Star

ARUN BIKASH DEV, Ctg

Rezaul Karim Chowdhury, the mayor-elect of Chattogram City Corporation, is set to take oath of office today, after winning last month's election with ruling Awami League's symbol "boat" in polls marred by low voter turnout and violence. In an interview with this newspaper, the new city father answered some unpleasant questions about his election, and shared his plans for the city.

The Daily Star (DS): You have been elected mayor in the polls where just 22.5 percent votes were cast. Are you happy to be elected mayor through votes of such a small number of constituents?

Rezaul Karim: Those who went to polling centres cast their votes. Nobody violated people's right to vote. If large number of voters do not go to polling centres, what can we do? BNP spread propaganda so voters do not go to polling centres. They engaged in violence, so people panicked, and felt discouraged to come to polling centres. Another reason was that the day of polls was not declared as a public holiday. So people went to work and did not come to cast votes. I am happy as I have been elected by a huge margin.

Children's health, safety should be top priority

Speakers tell "Safe Back to School" project launch

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Educational institutions should be opened with students' safety as the top priority, development practitioners said at the launching of "Safe Back to School (SB2S)" project.

Ensuring psycho-social counselling, training up the teachers on protocols related to Covid-19 and mental health, ensuring proper facilities such as soap, disinfectant, mask and water supply, and running awareness campaign to bring back girl children to school are the activities that should be undertaken by the govt and the stakeholders, they also stressed.

Fifteen international NGOs including Save the Children, Brac, World Vision and Plan International launched the project together at The Westin Dhaka in Gulshan-2 with the aim of working with the government in the next six months to ensure the safe return of students to schools.

Presenting a keynote paper, Brac Senior Director KAM Morsheed said, "During the period when schools were closed, incidents of domestic violence increased and many students dropped out."

Mentioning a report of the World Bank, he said, the learning process of all students through online and television mediums were not entirely effective as these methods were not highly accessible for everyone.

He also raised concern about social distancing at schools due to the large number of students.

Speaking as chief guest, Education Minister Dipu Moni said although educational institutions were closed, government's initiatives to educate the students did not stop.

She also said the government arranged an assignment system so that everyone could be involved with learning activities.

This crowded section of Noor Mansion Shopping Centre in the capital's Mirpur Road, where there is no available space to maintain distance and masks are few and far between, might imply that everyone has received the vaccine. But with many still waiting to get immunised against the virus, this is probably just another episode of people disregarding dangers Covid-19 poses to their health.

How Savar became a hub of rose cultivation

AKLAKUR RAHMAN AKASH, Savar

Sabed Ali was 16 years old when he began working as a gardener at Bangladesh National Zoo.

The young man was fascinated by gardening and nurturing plants from the very beginning. He quickly became an expert gardener after joining in 1979.

The rose -- a globally revered symbol for friendship, love and feelings -- was of special interest to him. Taken by the flower's beauty and the meanings it conveys, the young Sabed Ali dreamt of having a rose garden at his house.

And so he bought ten seedlings with Tk 350 and planted those in pots at his house in Nobaberbagh area in the capital's Mirpur-1 back in 1983.

Soon enough, his small initiative started scaling up. Within two years, his home garden became a sight to behold with blooming roses, even attracting visitors from nearby areas.

This inspired Sabed Ali to begin rose cultivation on a commercial basis. In 1989, he leased 20 decimal of land in Sadullapur area of Savar and began the venture.

"Starting off wasn't easy. Many people discouraged me from pursuing this commercially and criticised me. But I kept at it," recalled the 57-year-old Sabed Ali.

Eventually, his garden yielded enough flowers to be sold at the wholesale market in Dhaka's Shabbagh.

Sabed Ali then scaled up even more, leasing another 30 decimal of land.

He was the pioneering force behind large-scale rose cultivation in Sadullapur and adjacent villages of Shyampur, Mostapara, Birulia, Bhakurta and Bhabanipur.

At present, around 1,500 people from this villages are involved in commercial rose cultivation. The villages have gained a reputation as golap-er graam.

Farmers cultivating rose say they are making profit from the business, and to add to that, the area is attracting visitors from the surrounding areas.

Sabed Ali says he had no idea that his humble venture from 1989 would open new horizons for the people in the area.

"Many people are taking up this craft now. It makes me happy to see that. I welcome everyone into this venture and try to help them with my knowledge and experience," Sabed said while talking to this correspondent at his rose garden in Savar's Shyampur last January 30.

Mokbul Hossen, a farmer from Bonogram area said, "I began rose cultivation about 15 years ago. I was inspired by Sabed bhai. Now my garden covers 60 decimals of land."

"My family was poor. Through rose cultivation, we have been able to lift ourselves out of poverty. It would not have been possible without Sabed bhai's great initiative," said Mokbul.

Despite the success, the flower market has also taken a hit during the pandemic, and due to the popularity of plastic flowers. Sabed Ali said the production expenditures have skyrocketed, but the selling price of roses has dropped.

"Plastic flowers have flooded the market. This affects the demand for fresh roses," he explained.

Sabed Ali urged the government to patron rose cultivation and ensure fair prices for farmers.

"We need a wholesale rose market, a cold storage for preserving flowers and government's cooperation for flower export," added Sabed Ali.

DISABILITY RIGHTS IN BANGLADESH

Lack of data hampering progress

MD SHAHNAWAZ KHAN CHANDAN

How many people with disabilities are there in Bangladesh?

Seven years after passage of Rights and Protection of Persons with Disabilities Act, 2013, the answer to this question is still ambiguous.

The Department of Social Services (DSS) has been conducting a disability detection survey since 2013 and identified 21,43,357 people with disabilities all over the country till February 3. It is around 1.19 percent of the total population. Experts say the data does not reflect the exact number of people with disabilities in the country. There are also reliability and validity issues with the data, they added.

Of the total, 13,16,894 are male which is 61 percent of the total population, and 8,23,855 are female, which amounts to 38 percent. Transgender people with disabilities account for one percent of the total population, with the number being 2,608.

The DSS identified 4,65,693 children with disabilities, 21.72 percent of the total population.

"Our team in every upazila diagnoses them according to degree, type and severity following the guidelines of International Classification of Functioning Disability of World Health Organization. Every team has a doctor for this purpose," Dr Ashrafi Ahmad, programme director, disability detection survey program, told The Daily Star.

"After registering them, we are distributing ID cards denoting them as Golden Citizen. They are entitled to receive disability allowances and they also get priority to receive other benefits from the government," said Ashrafi, also a joint secretary of the social welfare ministry.

AHM Noman Khan, executive director, Centre for Disability in Development (CDD), does not think the identification survey reflects the prevalence of people with disabilities in the country.

"Because in most places disabled people have to visit the local administration offices to register themselves as disabled, which they often cannot do because of many reasons such as poverty, inaccessibility, distance etc. As a result, there is no doubt that many disabled people are still left unidentified," he said.

There are also reliability issues with these data, he added.

"Doctors and social workers who register people with disabilities are also not trained enough to distinguish between five types of neurological development disorders which require specialised knowledge on disability," said Noman, a Ramon Magsaysay awardee for mainstreaming persons with disabilities.

About the training, Dr Ashrafi commented, "The doctors are appointed by the health ministry. We give a short, introductory training on disability before deploying them. So, we cannot ensure whether these doctors have prior knowledge on disability or not."

DISABILITY PREVALENCE DATA DSS has disaggregated these data based on 12 types of disabilities. Physical disability is the most identified type of disability -- accounting for 46 percent of the total identified disabled people.

After physical disability, comes people with visual impairment (13.79 percent), followed by multiple disabilities (9.86 percent), intellectual disability (7.67 percent), speech impairment (6.9 percent), cerebral palsy (4.29 percent), hearing impairment (3.17 percent), chronic mental illness (3.5 percent), autism (2.74 percent), audio-visual impairment

What began as a small venture in 1989 has now become a viable livelihood option for many farmers in Savar, and that is Sabed Ali's life's work. He was picking flowers from his garden full of red roses when this picture was taken recently.
