Cry for water in the south

Safe drinking water a distant dream for 73pc people in five salinity-prone upazilas in Khulna-Satkhira region

PINAKI ROY and DIPANKAR ROY, Khulna

Roksana Khatun moves aside dirt and floating leaves from a pond, slowly lowers her earthen pitcher into it and fills it with around 20 litres of water. Collecting the water, she carefully climbs the muddy, steep stairs of the pond and walks around 45 minutes to return home. She holds the heavy pitcher against her waist or on her head the entire time.

Only to fetch water for her family, she does this arduous task every day, twice, throughout the year, except for a few months when it rains and she can store some drinking water, she told The Daily Star, while on her way home from the pond recently.

"I've a tubewell, but it does not work. I've no other option ... I need water for my family of six. I've been doing this for years," Roksana, aged

A team of Bangladeshi researchers in collaboration with Monash University in Malaysia came up with the findings after analysing 371 genome sequences of the virus.

They named the 34 unique mutations of SARS COV-2 as "Bangla Mutation".

NEWS ANALYSIS

Why so hush-hush?

MOHAMMAD AL-MASUM MOLLA

World leaders have frequently used the word "war" to describe the fight against the coronavirus primarily to emphasise how precious every second, every minute or every strategic decision is in combating the invisible killer.

Even slight delays in making and implementing decisions can jeopardise the whole effort, as has been seen in the case of numerous countries around the world in the last 15 months since Covid-19 was first detected in the Chinese city of Wuhan in December 2019.

Bangladesh is no exception.

The country's health officials identified a few cases of the UK variant of Covid-19 back in January, but this information was published only on March 10. The government also acknowledged the presence of the variant but has not explained the delay in sharing the information.
