STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Musleha Islam breathed her last yesterday, at the age of 93.

She passed away in her sleep due to old age complications.

Widowed at the age of 30 after her husband Farukul Islam -- an insurance pioneer and co-worker of young Bangabandhu and Awami League -- passed away in 1959, she raised her four children as a single mother and imbibed them with courage, patriotism, and values of serving the society.

She had a strong, charismatic personality and was deeply loved by everyone who got to know her.

For Kamini (orange jasmine) to bloom, the stars have to align. The sun has to give way to the clouds and thunder has to cry. Kamini only blooms in monsoon. But for the rest of the year, there's Rabindranath Tagore's numerous poems and pieces to remind you of the flower, and the season that hosts it. On 22nd Srabon, the death anniversary of the Bard, may the Kaminis of the world and the bees around them remind all of him. This photo was taken on Tuesday from Khulna's Dumuria.

Declare vaccines as a public good

Civil society groups urge govt

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT

Civil society groups and private sector leaders from home and abroad yesterday called for lifting the restrictions set in the WTO's Trade-Related Intellectual Property (TRIP) rights and declaring Covid vaccine as public goods to fight the coronavirus pandemic.

They said the UN should work to lift WTO restrictions on vaccines and the Bangladesh government should also take an effective policy to ensure vaccines for all.

The calls came at a webinar titled "Emerging Issues in Access to Treatment for Covid-19 in Bangladesh" jointly organised by Equity BD, People's Health Movement Bangladesh and the Third World Network.

Prof Dr Rashid-E-Mahub, former pro-vice chancellor of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujib Medical University, said, "We need a global socialistic view to ensure vaccination for all. We need vaccines on an equity basis, not on a profit base."

KM Gopakumar, senior researcher and legal advisor of Third World Network, an international non-profit based in Malaysia, said people in developing countries and LDCs need access to vaccines and other health products to survive the pandemic, which requires widespread availability of these health products.

TRIPS waiver offers the policy space to do away with the IP (intellectual property) monopoly and facilitate the scaling up or production through diversification of the manufacturing base, he said.

"There is an urgent need to negotiate a smooth transition period for graduating LDCs to address concerns on matters affecting peoples' health," he said.

YouTube plans to take on TikTok, Snapchat with creator payment scheme

NAVEED HUSSAIN

YouTube is treating short video platforms as its competitors, but they are increasingly posing to be an existential crisis for the social media giant, apparent by its desperate move of paying creators.

YouTube Shorts, YouTube's TikTok rival, will pay content creators up to $10,000 each month for producing popular short videos. YouTube intends to pay a total of $100 million over the next year, with the first installments due this month.

The fund has the potential to pay out a lot of money to creators, but no guarantees have been made. The level of popularity required to earn money will be determined by the number of individuals that create and view Shorts each month, as well as the location of each creator's audience.

These must also be original videos, according to YouTube. Reuploads and videos with watermarks from other platforms will disqualify a channel from receiving payments.

On YouTube, creators have traditionally been compensated based on the advertisements that appear in front of their videos, with a direct correlation between the number of ad views and the amount of money received. YouTube, on the other hand, doesn't want to put an ad in front of every quick clip, so it's developing this alternate method of payment to compensate creators.

YouTube's chief product officer, Neal Mohan, said that the Shorts Fund would eventually be replaced by a "long-term, scalable monetization program." The fund is "a way to get started and actually really start figuring out" how monetization for creators of these videos should work. "You're essentially consuming a feed of shorts, so the model has to work differently," said Neal in a recent conversation on The Decoder.

TikTok and Snapchat both pay creators based on video popularity rather than ad revenue. The result could be lucrative for creators, though there is less transparency about how much they might earn each month.

The fund provides a way for YouTube to jumpstart its late-in-the-game effort at a short-form video service. Though TikTok has a significant head start, YouTube is, after all, YouTube — a massive and massively popular video platform — which could give it an advantage as it attempts to launch YouTube Shorts, its own version of TikTok.

For the time being, the payments are only available in ten regions, including the United States, the United Kingdom, India, and Brazil, among others.
