UK to probe systematic bias in medical devices tech

AFP, London

Britain's health secretary announced Sunday he has launched an independent review to examine if "systematic bias" exists in the development of medical devices, after Covid-19 brought the issue "to the fore".

Sajid Javid said he would also work with his counterpart in the United States, Xavier Becerra, and other like-minded nations around the world "so we can shape what sits behind these valuable technologies".

Writing in the Sunday Times newspaper, Javid cited research showing that oximeters -- which monitor oxygen levels and have been used during the pandemic -- are less accurate on people with darker skin as highlighting the potential problem.

"One of the founding principles of our NHS is equality, and the possibility that a bias -- even an inadvertent one -- could lead to a poorer health outcome is totally unacceptable," he wrote, referring to Britain's National Health Service.

"We urgently need to know more about the bias in these devices, and what impact it is having on the front line. "So I have commissioned an independent review, looking at whether systematic bias exists within current devices, and if so, how we can address it."

Javid, the son of Pakistani immigrants and the first person from an ethnic minority to hold the role of UK health secretary, said it would assess all medical devices, and other common biases aside from racial bias, such as gender.

He noted his interest in focusing on this issue came in part from seeing health disparities during the height of the coronavirus crisis last winter.

IMF renews $50b credit line for Mexico

AFP, Washington

The IMF announced Friday it has renewed a two-year credit line for Mexico for $50 billion.

The Mexican economy remains exposed to risks, including from the impact of Covid-19, and the flexible credit line (FCL) will provide insurance against those risks and bolster market confidence, the International Monetary Fund said in a statement.

The government considers the credit line "precautionary" and has gradually reduced the amount since 2017, when it totaled nearly $90 billion, the IMF said.

"The Mexican economy is rebounding from its deepest recession in decades, spurred by strong US growth and rising vaccination rates," said Geoffrey Okamoto, the IMF's first deputy managing director.

"The authorities have successfully maintained external, financial, and fiscal stability, despite the pandemic-related challenges.

"The IMF first approved the FCL for Mexico in 2009, and it is one of five countries that has received the backdrop along with Colombia, Chile, Peru and Poland, which exited the arrangement in late 2017. None of the countries has drawn on the funds, the IMF said.

Build your own brand

An analyst in a consulting company is evaluated on the quality of his/her deliverables. If they choose to focus on sales or other activities that form a manager's KPI (key performance indicator), the quality of their work will inevitably suffer.

This expectation will change as you progress in your career. And if you want people to trust your brand, you must perform at a high level in all the competencies your role requires.

Develop your skills: While this is in no way limited to developing your personal brand, it is still a very important step in making people trust you. People will hire you or work with you based on your offering. If you don't offer a higher quality of service than the alternatives in the market, there is no reason for them to choose you over them.

Consistency: If your quality of work suffers from a series of hits and misses, then you will be branded as inconsistent. You must churn out high quality output consistently and have a learning mindset that seeks to minimise the mistakes that you make.

Create trust in your manner of work: The way you communicate, how you dress, the delivery in a presentation and the way you handle conflicts are all reflective of your competency. In industries such as investment banking, a dress code is strictly adhered to, while in tech industries, that may not be an expectation. Expectations differ, so find out what matters most.

Deliver according to client expectations: Clients are not necessarily external; your boss or your superiors can be clients as well. However, for those in a client-facing industry such as banking and finance or professional services such as consulting, meeting client expectations is the bedrock on which their personal brand is built.

The most rewarding careers are based on clients, whether they are individuals or institutions, trusting you to make decisions on their behalf. If they can trust that you would place their interests before your own and would always be available to them, then you will command a strong brand. For instance, the CFA Institute's code of ethics states that charter-holders must put their clients ahead of both themselves and their employers.

Highlight your work: Finally, all the above may be ineffective if you are unable to communicate that your work is of very high quality. Ask for more responsibility, take the tough jobs, make that client presentation, go the extra mile, and deliver on the responsibility that you have assumed.

If you never claim credit for your work, you will never gain renown. But if you are a braggart or someone who steals credit, no amount of competency will let your brand survive.

Personal or individual brands can't be built overnight. It takes years of consistently doing the right thing at a high level. This comes down to attitude and a relentless focus on doing work that is tough and learning from it.

How you carry yourself, how you act in a challenging situation, how your work motivates people, why people will remember you in your absence, and moreover, how you create value in the society -- all combine to help you build your own brand.
