

Private university students learning how to say ‘Sohomot Bhai’

Other university clubs ran out of members and became useless as the wave of newcomers hit the political booth.

Just when the students of private universities were thinking they had studied enough courses to be a “corporate frontrunner”, their universities introduced a new course, Introduction to Party-ing, to ensure that students could contribute to the holy politics of Chapasthan.

The course was added to their current curriculum so that their students wouldn’t lag behind in saying “Sohomot Bhai”, Chapasthan’s most common phrase, which denotes blind agreement with a local or international influential.

“After conducting a survey, we found that 50 percent of our students fail to grab opportunities just because they aren’t used to saying ‘Sohomot Bhai’. However, we believe our new addition, Introduction to Party-ing, will help them say ‘Sohomot Bhai’ more and more and eventually contribute to the growth of GDP,” Politicalauddin, the VC of Money Making University, clarified their new plan.

After universities introduced the new course, a group of students wasted no time in introducing their new committee. Other university clubs ran out of members and became useless as the wave of newcomers hit the political booth where registration was going on and a written manual was being handed out on how to say or write “Sohomot Bhai” properly.

“Look, you can never be a political idol unless you say and write ‘Sohomot Bhai’ properly,” Pathokbhai, a political idol, said while recruiting new students for his political group.

While observing the current ambience of the universities, students were seen practising saying “Sohomot Bhai” loudly. A student said to another, “What should I write if I want to say the word in English?”

The student said, “Just say and write it in Bangla. Because, ‘Sohomot Bhai’ is more fascinating and appealing to political leaders than any other word.”

“But, if I don’t agree with the leader, what should I say?”

“You still need to say ‘Sohomot Bhai’,” the student replied.

“Great. Now put your helmet on.”

Are govt officials mulling cosmic tours now?

KHALID HOSSAIN

Elon Musk yesterday took to social media to post the following after the top billionaire and notorious bluff master lost a small fraction of his wealth, worth billions of dollars, to Twitter.

“Space-Ex now offers a 69 per cent discount to state officials who want to take a round trip to Mars to understand how rich billionaires function to generate pocket money,” Musk wrote on Twitter.

In other news that we are not sure is related, government officials have vowed to no longer embark on educational trips to foreign countries.

Having boosted other countries’ economies in times of global financial crisis, numerous fake Facebook accounts had criticized the Chapasthan officials relentlessly.

“Space-Ex now offers a 69 per cent discount to state officials who want to take a round trip to Mars to understand how rich billionaires function.”

The backlash reached boiling point when the mayor of Dhoka West decided to travel to the US to learn about the art of Waste Management.

Previously, trips to figure out how to build ponds, cultivate rice and potatoes, purify polluted river water, so on and so forth, had caused massive uproar, especially among the naive tax-paying community in the country.

“Our people finally understand the public sentiment,” a general secretary of the trip-advisor ministry told The Daily Nebula while requesting anonymity.

The secretary revealed that the relevant authorities have already sat for a meeting at an undisclosed location, where they signed an agreement that bars them from travelling to other countries to gather precious general knowledge and in the process, make countless BCYes cadres envious.

At the time of writing, Musk was yet to reveal whether or not his latest tweet was a joke.

Where has Orna gone?

BEHAYA BASHER

It has been decades since she went missing.

Still today, law enforcers, government organisations, citizens of Bangladesh are looking for Orna Binte Rahman, 43. Since the death of secularism in the country, Orna, considered an angel on earth, has played an essential role in the protection of women. She has singlehandedly turned “bad” women into “good” ones by her mere presence. Middle-aged men, and women under their influence, who seem to be most concerned about her whereabouts have formed a search party on behalf of the government and taken to social media over the past few years to find her.

According to them, her disappearance has been a risk to the lives of many women in the country.

Asked, IM Purush, a member of the search party, said, “How are women in the country even existing in the country without Orna? We are very concerned about her whereabouts. She needs to be found immediately.”

On why other women may face danger, he said, “Orna was and remains an instrumental figure in leading women, who have otherwise been led astray, onto the right path.”

Speaking to Satireday, Md Lok Man, officer-in-charge of Purushtantrik Police Station, said, “The search has been on for years. We know the women of the country are reluctant to find her because they are jealous of how much preference the males have given Orna for so long. You know our women, their moral fibre is frail, but the fibre of Orna is not. So we know that once Orna is found, they will all come to the right path. She will inspire them to be as good as the men of this nation. And that is our goal.”

Since the tragic disappearance, photos and Facebook statuses of women have been filled with comments such as “Orna koi? (where is Orna)” made by members of the search party, who, from the goodness of their hearts, want to remind us all that she is yet to be found.

WHEN FACT TRUMPS FICTION

“Since I am a positive person, I try to remain positive and I believe that we can even become the world champions. But the path won’t be easy at all. Maybe it will take us six months to a year” ... “We may not be able to win one or two games in the tri-nation series in New Zealand.” It was fortunate that Bangladesh team director Khaled Mahmud spoke these words late in the week because it broke our satire-o-meter, which churns out satire pieces. If he had said it earlier, this page would have been blank. We are working on fixing the satire-o-meter, stay tuned.
