Women and girls most vulnerable to climate change
Says speakers at UNFPA photo exhibition

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

The United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and the Australian High Commission in Bangladesh yesterday jointly launched a photo exhibition, advocating for an increased attention on upholding the rights of women and girls during disasters.

The exhibition was organised at National Museum, to raise awareness on the impact of the climate crisis on women and girls.

It will continue till November 16. All the photos displayed at the exhibition were captured by photographer Naymuzzaman Prince of UNFPA Bangladesh.

Terming Bangladesh one of the most disaster-prone countries in the world, speakers at the programme said the effects of climate change impact everyone, especially, women and girls in the country.

It also intensifies life-threatening dangers for women and girls, such as going missing, being trafficked, and being sexually abused, among others, they said.

UNFPA Representative Kristine Blokhuis, Deputy High Commissioner of Australia Nardia Simpson and UN Resident Coordinator Gwyn Lewis spoke at the event.

Speakers also held a discussion at the event, moderated by Dr Ahsan Uddin Ahmed, member of the Independent Technical Advisory Panel of the Green House Fund.

The lost art of hand painted posters

MOHAMMAD JAMIL KHAN

There used to be a time when movie posters and banners were hand-painted by artists.

Big banners were hung on high walls in front of theatres and posters were kept in glass boxes outside the main auditorium.

But those days are long gone. With the advent of technology, movie posters and banners are now digitally procured.

This begets the question -- what happened to these painters who once made a living drawing these posters?

"Majority of these painters, who were involved in the profession are either dead or sitting idle at their homes. Only a few of them are working jointly with graphic designers as assistants," said Md Soyeab, a painter who left the profession after 2003.

Soyeb said he started his career back in 1965 when he was just 13 years old.

After the recently released Bangla movie "Operation Sundarbans", the practice of handpainted posters was revived.

Soyeb was among the two artists who painted posters for the movie. His co-artist was Bidesh Kumar Dhar, now working with graphic artists as an assistant.

While talking to The Daily Star recently, these two artists shared the journey and end of the industry.

Bidesh Kumar, popularly known as BKD among people in the film industry, said making hand-painted movie banners and posters completely stopped after

When asked how artists survived in that period, Soyeb said primarily he used to draw portraits between 2005 and 2006.

"I also used to paint signboards and banners. But those kinds of work also stopped after 2006."

Sharing the experience of working as a painter in a movie after such a long time, Soyeb said, "I was a bit nervous when the 'Operation Sundarbans' team contacted me for a poster."

"I thought I will not be able to draw with the same skill I once had," he said.

"Making a poster is not an easy job as we have to bring the whole sequence of the movie in a single painting," Soyeb explained.

"When BKD and I worked as painters in the '60s, our monthly salary was around Tk 5 only. And when we left the profession in 2003, the salary was Tk 600
