Senegal to miss 'best player' Mane

Senegal coach Aliou Cisse said Sadio Mane's absence from the World Cup will be felt by fans across the globe, after the forward was ruled out of the tournament with a leg injury.

Mane, who came second to Karim Benzema in this year's Ballon D'Or vote for the world's best player, damaged his right fibula playing for Bayern Munich and his absence was confirmed on Thursday in a crushing blow to Senegal's hopes for the tournament. Read full story Senegal kick off their campaign against the Netherlands at Al Thumama Stadium on Monday, and Cisse said the spectacle would be poorer without African football's star attraction.

We're not just talking about the Senegalese people here. I think people all over the world," he told reporters on Sunday. "The whole football family is saddened by what has happened because he was the second best player in the world and he represents the African continent, as well as representing Senegal.

"It's very, very sad for him. Especially, we wish him a speedy recovery. I hope he gets back to playing football as quickly as Netherlands coach Louis van Gaal said his side are keen to deliver like never before as they prepare for their World Cup opener against Senegal on Monday.

The 71-year-old, in his third stint as national coach and who led the Dutch to a third-placed finish in Brazil in 2014, said the quality in his squad is even higher than the team he brought to

"I believe that this group of players are well-connected to each other together, they work well together in a professional way, and I think that will always contribute to success," Van Gaal told a news conference on Sunday.

The coach, who won the Champions League in 1995 with a brilliant generation of young Dutch players at Ajax Amsterdam, said he has high expectations.

"In 2014 we came third with a squad that was of lesser quality than this one, and with this group I expect more. It depends not only on technical skills and tactical skills, but it also depends on a bit of luck, that you score at the right time and that the others don't score," he said.

"I think that we could become

"I called him the next day in the morning, obviously I wanted to know how he was first and foremost, because there was so many rumours coming out and just as a friend I wanted to know how he was," Van Dijk said.

Van Dijk said his team were very much looking forward to the tournament getting underway.

"I'm relaxed, that's it, nothing else - of course I'm excited, jut like the other guys, these last few days passed really slowly," he said.

While the Netherlands are hoping to bank on quality, Senegal coach Aliou Cisse told his younger players that it was their time to shine after talisman Mane

"Of course we won't hide the the Senegalese team -- he's very important, a coach builds his team around his best players.

"But there's also a group here with experienced players, with young players ready to step up. We've had to play matches before without Sadio Mane."

Cisse said the champions, who also face Ecuador and hosts Qatar in Group A, have "excellent young players".

"I have a lot of depth on the bench so I will be able to make good subs if someone is getting tired," he said.

Whoever gets the role against Senegal in the Group A clash at the Al Thumama Stadium on Monday, however, will be vastly inexperienced after the shock snub of Jasper Cillessen, who most Dutch soccer pundits assumed would be the first choice in Qatar.

Instead, Van Gaal surprised by picking three keepers with a total of eight caps between them, continuing the indecision that has marked his choice in goal since returning for a third stint in charge of the national team last year.

Ajax Amsterdam's Remko Pasveer is fancied to play in Monday's match, in what would be a remarkable moment in a journeyman career. He won his first cap at the age of 38 when the Dutch beat Poland in September and kept his place for the next game against Belgium - the last the Dutch played before the World Cup.
Pasveer was originally signed by Ajax as a back-up goalkeeper but was thrown into the team when they lost their two leading keepers to suspension and injury and is now on the cusp of a remarkable achievement.

Justin Bijlow has the other caps, used by Van Gaal in his first six games in charge but not used in the nine matches since.

Andries Noppert from Heerenveen is the other goalkeeper in the squad. Reportedly Noppert was the one who had the most practice during the Netherlands' final training session on Sunday. If selected, the 28-year-old will be the first Dutch stopper to make his international

The United States and Wales will head into Monday's World Cup clash knowing that victory could decide one of Group B's two qualifiers, with England fancied as heavy favourites to advance as group winners. With a golden generation of talent spearheaded by Gareth Bale and playing at their first World Cup in 64 years, Wales will be out to echo their recent successes at European level, having reached the Euro 2016 semifinals and the last 16 at Euro

Manager Rob Page called up nine Premier League players to his World Cup squad - which U.S. coach Gregg Berhalter said the Americans must underestimate despite Wales's preparations being hampered by injuries to key players including Joe Allen and Aaron Ramsey. "I think that, at least to the American media, Wales is under-rated," Berhalter told reporters. "When I look at their squad, it's basically a Premier League squad. To me, it's a really good squad, a formidable squad. They've been in international competition before, they know what it's like. And it's going to be a very difficult game."

The U.S. team healthy and available, and Christian Pulisic, Gio Reyna and Weston endured a rocky McKennie will all be out to leave their mark in their first World Cup appearance.
