Surma dredging plan may be futile

Say experts as BWDB prepares to dredge 15km of 166-km river

DWOHA CHOWDHURY

This year was a disastrous blow for Sylhet's people, due to a devastating flood that continued for around two months from May 12.

Besides floods, in recent years, the city has been facing acute waterlogging. On September 5, only three hours of rain inundated many areas of the city.

For this situation, experts and authorities concerned have pointed fingers at the struggle for Surma river to navigate through the city.

Amid the long-standing demand of dredging the river, it took authorities decades to finally decide on it.

The 15.05 kilometres of Surma, beside the city, is set to be dredged soon.

However, environmental activists raised concerns saying that dredging a small part of the 166-kilometre trans-boundary river won't change the flood situation.

REASONS BEHIND DELAYED INITIATIVES

From 2012 to 2019, Bangladesh Water Development Board (BWDB) prepared three project proposals to dredge Surma and other waterbodies in the upper-Meghna basin. The first two were scrapped by the ministry.

Its 2019 proposal, which had a budget of Tk 2,200 crore, faced an inter-departmental challenge, since Bangladesh Inland Water Transport Authority (BIWTA) also prepared a Tk 3,000 crore (approx) project.

than 3.68 lakh people and incurring financial losses of Tk 1,238 crore for the division (according to government data).

Considering the pressing demand, BWDB finally got the approval to dredge a small part of the river beside the city under an ongoing project to protect riverbanks.

AKM Niloy Pasha, assistant engineer of BWDB Sylhet, said, "There was an ongoing project to protect Surma's riverbank at Sylhet Sadar and Bishwanath upazila's Rajapur, Mahtabpur and Dashgram areas."

Under this project, the water resources ministry's trustee organisation -- Institute of Water Modelling -- conducted a hydro-morphology study and found that 15.05 kilometres need dredging.

"According to the study, a tender has been called. However, as the recent flood changed the riverbed in some areas, the detailed project plan (DPP) has been revised and now awaiting ministry approval," he said.

"The ongoing project is scheduled to be finished by June

"This is good news that authorities concerned finally stepped forward to dredge the river. But the benefit won't last longer than two years, since the river's upstream isn't being dredged."

After a stalemate in the decision, two more years of inaction passed by.
