

HARASSMENT PREVENTION CELLS AT UNIVS

Members unaware, untrained: speakers

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Although many educational institutions have formed a sexual harassment prevention committee after receiving a letter from the education ministry regarding the implementation of the 2009 HC guidelines, in reality, most of the committee members are unaware and untrained in their roles, revealed Amrai Pari Paribarik Nirjaton Protirodh Jot (We Can) yesterday.

Although most of the committee members were supposed to be women, the reality is different, it added.

According to Amrai Pari Paribarik Nirjaton Protirodh Jot, only a few universities submit an annual report to the government on their performance.

Zinat Ara Haque, chief executive of We Can, shared this information at a roundtable, titled "Policies to Prevent Sexual Harassment in Educational Institution: Implementation and Barriers", organised by We Can, in association with UN Women Bangladesh, with financial support from Global Affairs, Canada.

The event was held at The Daily Star Centre in the capital.

"The monitoring mechanism is very weak at the government and non-government level, especially, the national level monitoring mechanism is very much unclear in the polytechnic institutes," said Zinat.

We Can provided training on sexual harassment and sexual violence to the students, teachers, and staffers, of six educational institutions and formed different groups among the students to raise awareness regarding the issue, said the organisation.

Selina Akhter, assistant professor at Patuakhali Government College, said although a committee has been formed at her institution, students have not been filing complaints to the box.

"I feel the students do not feel secure enough to complain, considering the social stigma and stereotype, which lead to further harassment," she said.

"I think the families must be included in these programmes for female students to get the confidence from their family members," added Selina.

Sujan Kanti Mali, associate professor at Patuakhali Science and Technology University, echoed the same.

"There is also a prevalent culture of moral policing that needs to be taken into account," he said.

Northern schools lagging behind

Reveals study on multilingual education

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Compared to Chattogram's hill regions, schools in northern districts are lagging in distributing textbooks, educating in the mother tongue and teacher training programmes, to implement multilingual education, showed a study.

Researchers revealed this information in a programme, titled "Assessment of Multilingual Education (MLE) in the CHT and Plain Land" organised by Manusher Jonno Foundation (MJF) in the capital's Brac Centre.

Rani Yan Yan, advisor of Chakma circle in Rajbari, Rajdweep and Rangamati, presented the keynote in the programme.

The number of trained teachers in multilingual education is much lower than necessary. The duration of their training is also very short, she said during the presentation.

The report found that around 60 percent of students drop out of primary school due to economic, social, cultural and linguistic problems.

As the medium of education is Bengali, those textbooks look unfamiliar and unattractive to indigenous children.

The study also said around 162 indigenous students among 182 in the plain land did not receive MLE lessons and textbooks. They could not even read or write in their mother tongue.

The study identified some reasons behind the problems, which include -- a lack of clear guidelines from the government, inadequate training facilities for teachers, lack of qualified teachers and multilingual textbooks.

Attending as the chief guest, Mosammat Hamida Begum, secretary of the CHT affairs ministry, said, "If we can continue to teach our children in their mother tongue, they would get quality education."

She also termed the mother tongue as an intangible cultural heritage and urged on preserving it.

Attending as a guest of honour, Rasheda K Choudhury, executive director of Campaign for Popular Education, said, there has been a misconception among the people of CHT that they would not get the opportunity to pursue mainstream education or get good jobs if they receive education in their mother tongues.

"And hence, we need community mobilisation to create

Sending children to school making jute ropes

2 orgs helping Chilmari women become skilled workers

S DILIP ROY

Rasheda Beram (28), a mother of two and a homemaker of a poor family in Kurigram's Chilmari upazila barely forgot the last time she spent a day with a smile on her face.

Poverty was her daily companion, and she was totally dependent on her husband for money, who worked as a day labourer.

The money her husband earned wasn't enough to run their family of four. Her children rarely had food on their plates three times a day, and education remained a distant dream for them.

But Rasheda's story didn't end there. Last month, an NGO offered her training opportunities to make jute ropes and earn some money.

At present, she's earning Tk 60-80 every day by making jute ropes at home, which are later used to make different products like women's clothes, bags, mattresses and so forth.

Rasheda said she spends 3-4 hours a day making jute ropes. The raw materials are supplied from the NGO.

"Now my earnings are of great benefit to the family. I have started sending my children to school," Rasheda said.

Making jute ropes has brought smiles to the faces of Kurigram's Chilmari women, as they are now earning Tk 50-60 a day through the work. With this money, they're no longer dependent on their husbands and can send their children to school. This photo was taken recently.
