

There is no 'development' without a living wage

Shehzad M Arifeen
teaches anthropology at the Department of Economics and Social Sciences in Brac University.

SHEHZAD M ARIEEN

A spectre is haunting Bangladesh—the spectre of “bourgeois terrorism.” For months now, the workers that keep the country’s largest, most prestigious industry running have been agitating to secure a minimum wage that they can more or less live on. The response has been business-as-usual; the state has unleashed all its repressive powers—including 37 cases filed against over 14,000 workers, many of them unnamed, in Dhaka, Gazipur, Savar, and Ashulia, and police opening fire on them, which has already killed at least four workers. Labour organisers and activists are disappearing, while workers are being fired for speaking to the media.

Meanwhile, the so-called wage board, after a seven-month delay (surely intended to align with the election season) and a farcical proposal of Tk 10,500, has settled on a Tk 12,500 minimum wage. This proposal—which, as others have pointed out, is simply the factory owners’ voice filtered through the legitimising device of the “board”—does not even come close to the Centre for Policy Dialogue’s conservative suggestion of a Tk 17,500 wage, let alone the Tk 23,000-Tk 25,000 that workers, unions, and labour organisations have been demanding for years.

Accompanying this farce has been the usual stream of rationalisations: “small factories,” “low productivity,” “double incomes,” “troublemakers,” “low prices,” and of course, the ever-imminent threat of industrial and economic collapse that somehow never actually arrives. No matter how many times they are pushed to raise the minimum wage—always at considerable human cost—the industry only seems to prosper, as we are told about night and day, except when it comes to paying workers their due.

Truly, it has become quite impossible to take the RMG industry and what it says seriously.

It has become quite impossible to take the RMG industry and what it says seriously.

PHOTO: AMRAN HOSSAIN

Economists, journalists, and activists have already broken down, in great detail, how misleading and dishonest the state and BGMEA’s calculations and narratives are. Intelligent people should not have to be told that a Tk 1,250 food allowance in today’s Bangladesh is a prescription for slow starvation. More than anything, moments like this serve as the most vivid illustration of what it means to call the state an instrument of class domination.

Perhaps we should not expect anything else. After all, we are talking about the industry that has long styled itself as the nation’s saviour, to the extent that it seems like it is in business out of patriotic duty. Long before the Padma Bridge or the Dhaka metro rail, we had the RMG industry, saving us from poverty and stagnant growth after an apparently misguided and short-lived experiment with socialist planning. It has given us “development,” delivered us that national prosperity that we were once promised, and to it we are now erecting monuments. No one can deny, of course, the tremendous role that the industry has played in generating this national wealth, but it has not done so by some magical force of its own. It has ridden the power of labour and no small amount of constant state support—support that has also helped keep that labour cheap and in check.

“Garments” have not delivered the people of Bangladesh; it is the people of Bangladesh who have made “garments” possible, along with some considerable personal fortunes. We may have abandoned socialism, but there has been precious little “freedom” in the “free markets” that we have supposedly embraced. And if we can feed this industry with blood, sweat, and taxes year after year, surely we should be able to decide the bare minimum that it pays its workers?

“This independence will only be a true independence to me, when the workers, peasants, and all the suffering people of Bangladesh are delivered from their misery.” So said Sheikh Mujibur Rahman (quoted in MM Akash’s 2022 book Bangabandhu’s Development

Philosophy: Towards a Poverty-Free Planned Bangladesh), not some “doped” flower-selling child, nor some supposedly fictional day-labourer. It is sad to see what has become of a political party that had once waged war for economic justice, for the right to rice and clothes (after all, there is more to “Joy Bangla” than just “Bangla”).

But perhaps I am being unfair. Why else are we busy building new roads and bridges, power plants and ports, expressways, metros, airport terminals, and underwater tunnels across the land today, if not so that the people of Bangladesh can move more, earn more, buy more, sell more, and live well? And what is development, if not the right and ability to live well? So it certainly is. But if, by chance, it might also be important to be able to afford food along the way to the Padma Bridge, then any “right to development” must include the right to a living wage. At any rate, it might at least be accorded the same status as the “right to export” today.

The prime minister often captures her regime’s developmental vision as an effort to “transform the fortunes” (“bhaggo poriborton”) of the people of Bangladesh. It is a powerful turn of phrase, and gets to the heart of the promise and power of development. The people of Bangladesh deserve a better fortune; they have sacrificed much for it. There is also no doubt that our fortunes are indeed transforming—that the enormous wealth now coursing through the veins of this land is finding its way into many pockets. But it is categorically undeniable that some people’s destinies have transformed far better than those of others’, and that the massive new fortunes being made in this land depend on keeping enough people desperate to survive in any way possible. If it was not so, we would not have to shoot and kill workers to ensure that these fortunes keep coming in. If Bangladesh’s RMG industry—despite making record sales and profits year after year, and despite receiving constant governmental support (be it cash or cajole)—still cannot afford to pay its workers enough to live, then why should it exist?

WORLD TOILET DAY

Women need better access to public restrooms

Syeda Afrin Tarannum
is a sub editor at Campus of The Daily Star.

SYEDA AFRIN TARANNUM

I had once resorted to using a public restroom when I was about the age of six. The traffic was miserable that day, and I couldn’t hold it much longer. It was traumatising and I’ve never spoken of it since. Despite my attempts to erase the memory, I’ve found it extremely difficult to forget the stench of ammonia and the splatters of faeces across the walls, all tied in nicely with puddles of mud on a floor of what possibly was white tile at some point. I have not been to a public toilet ever since.

I’m very particular about my bathroom preferences. I’ve also lived a significant portion of my life commuting for an average of three to four hours a day—ever since I was in school. So, my circumstances have led me to develop an extremely meticulous bathroom schedule and an even more accurate map of spots I could

VISUAL: SALMAN SAKIB SHAHRYAR

Farmgate about six days a week, using either the metro rail, the expressway, or one of the “regular routes” (via Banani or Hatirjheel). On the way, there are one or two of the newly renovated public toilets, with one of them being about 100 metres from my destination, and the other quite a bit off my usual routes.

The issue is not limited to Dhaka. If anything, it is significantly worse for people travelling outside the city, where most—especially women—tend to refrain from using any restrooms, be it the public toilets or those at fuel stations or rest houses, due to the inherent lack of hygiene control and other necessary amenities.

According to a report of The Daily Star, there are only 103 public toilets across all of Dhaka city—for the use of its more than 20 million people. Out of these 103, many are and have been out of service, many are not used at all, and most are not used by women at all.

resort to in case of an emergency.

To nobody’s surprise, none of the aforementioned spots include any of Dhaka city’s public toilets, and for good reason. I travel to and from Uttara and they have never used the public restrooms, nor have they considered using it. In case of emergencies, they have made detours to restaurants, malls, or even a friend’s place. If none of those worked out, they usually refrain from using the bathroom till they reach their destination.

I went further and asked them if they were aware that delaying the use of restrooms could result in poor bladder health and frequent bouts of urinary tract infections (UTIs). They all said yes. Unfortunately, some of them had already dealt with such infections, but they still choose to wait to reach their destination instead of resorting to a public toilet.

The issue is not just that of hygiene, however. Many women, including myself, do not feel safe visiting such facilities. It’s not unlikely for locks or windows to be broken in restrooms, given that the actual toilets and/or the water supply have fallen into disrepair.

Recently, I’ve come across a few mobile toilets around Dhaka, mostly in north Dhaka, but from what I have observed, they are mostly operated by men, automatically ruling out many women using them due to sheer discomfort.

The lack of hygiene and maintenance, however, is not just limited to the public toilets. It is also the case for most washrooms in general that are used by the masses. Be it washrooms in malls, restaurants, or hospitals, the lack of maintenance and the overall number of washrooms that have fallen to disrepair are staggering.

In the midst of all of this, asking for public toilets and restrooms in public places to accommodate sanitary product vending machines seems like a fool’s dream. While some universities and educational institutions have started to implement such services, one would have to be very lucky to come across these in their time of need.

Putting all of this together paints a pretty horrific picture of the public toilet scene for women already. But when it comes to women with disabilities, needing access to any such services, this issue becomes one I cannot begin to reckon.

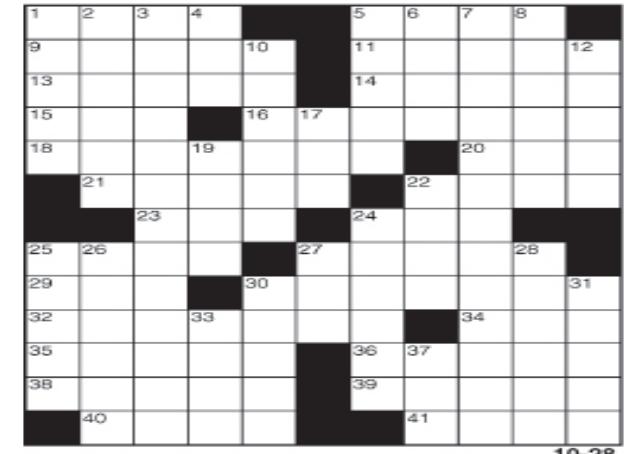

Towards the end of last year, through a series of social media posts, a youth activist and a student of North South University shared her horrendous experience of dealing with classes and Dhaka’s traffic without any accessible washrooms nearby. Since then, NSU has developed disability-friendly washrooms, but that is all there has been in terms of that. No other public services have been made available to accommodate the needs of those with disabilities. Even the existing services lack maintenance.

Access to basic sanitation and hygiene products should not be too much to ask for in a country that has introduced an intricate web of infrastructure to improve its urban lifestyle in recent years. Proper funding, planning, and execution could make the experience of using public restrooms a lot more bearable—if not pleasant—for a majority of people constantly on the go.

CROSSWORD

BY THOMAS JOSEPH

ACROSS	obstacles	10 Beat
1 Makes togs	32 Replies	reporters
5 Division	34 Attack	12 Pigeon’s
9 2000 NBA	command	perch
MVP	35 After a while	17 Spectrum
11 Perfect	36 Horse opera	color
13 Shipping box	38 Place	19 “Return
14 Quench	39 Reunion girl	of the Jedi”
15 Model buy	40 Makes	creature
16 Welcomed	mistakes	22 Jets, for one
18 Devious sort	41 Sketched	24 Dramatist
20 Glutton		Ben
21 Chopped		25 Bargains
down		26 Fancy
22 Heredit		27 Way off
23 Harry’s		28 For each
friend		30 Grazing
24 Pickle buy		groups
25 Berth place		31 Propeller
27 “12 Angry		shape
Men” star		33 Put on
29 Pitching stat		37 Help
30 Emotional
DOWN
1 Laundry pairs
2 Add value to
3 One might mention highs and lows
4 Was inactive
5 Stair part
6 Goofing off
7 Cleaning aid
8 Hire

FRIDAY’S ANSWERS

R	A	F	A		C	A	R	P	S
A	B	U	T	S	A	V	E	R	T
C	O	M	E	T	R	O	G	U	E
E	V	E	R	E	D	W	I	N	E
R	E	D	S	E	A	M	I	D
					P	A	R	T	E
					P	R	A	M	R
					M	A	S	P	I
					A	L	E	R	D
					R	E	D	W	O
					C	R	I	E	D
					E	M	E	N	D
					L	O	R	D	S

WRITE FOR US. SEND US YOUR OPINION PIECES TO
dsopinion@gmail.com