

young climate activists. Renowned experts in the country conducted the sessions.

This was also done after consulting with our young minds who are now entwined with our campaign. We also held a very successful media roundtable in collaboration with The Daily Star prior to COP28 with the young climate activists and seniors in the climate space which included policymakers, CSO practitioners, climate experts, and journalists.

This magazine is Save the Children in Bangladesh's latest voyage into enhancing children's and youth voices on climate by creating more spaces for them to share their stories on climate issues and we hope to continue to publish more of these in the future.

As the Generation Hope campaign progresses, we at Save the Children hope to engage more and more children and youth, with immediate plans for a joint children platform to be launched next year, an idea Dr. Saleemul Huq had laid down earlier in the year.
