So, how are these individuals managing to land jobs in a market that is 'unstable' and has 'a lack of opportunities'? The answer to this is simple – they outmatch other job seekers and candidates in terms of skills.

As the nation advances in technology and globalisation, the demand for a varied skill set becomes paramount. From digital literacy and adaptability to cultural awareness and ethical decision-making, all these competencies bridge academic

There are still many who manage to secure jobs right after graduating. Some even have decent-paying jobs on their hands before they graduate. knowledge with practical success, and today's employers want all these skills, aside from other technical skills, in their employees.

"Recruiters are placing a significant emphasis on certain soft skills when evaluating graduates or potential recruits," says Rifah Nanjiba, a business development team lead of a globally renowned IT company. "Among these, effective communication, a positive attitude, critical thinking, and

The Bangladeshi job market, like many other job markets across the world, is very dynamic in nature. People often say that this particular job market is unstable or that there is a lack of opportunities here. However, while there may be some truth to this, it may not be the case entirely. In fact, similar descriptions are also applicable to job markets in other parts of the world.

That being said, there are still many who manage to secure jobs right after graduating. Some even have decent-paying jobs on their hands before they graduate.

Graduates cannot limit themselves to being satisfied with whatever skills they have acquired during their university lives.
