16 DAYS OF ACTIVISM AGAINST GENDER-BASED VIOLENCE

Institutions failing to ensure justice Savs MJF

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

The progress in addressing violence against women and children in Bangladesh has been slow, said Manusher Jonno Foundation (MJF) in a statement

MJF issued the statement on the occasion of the 16 Days of Activism against Gender-Based Violence.

The organisation expressed strong concern over the slow progress and condemned the existing ineffective structures designed to combat such violence.

The organisation expressed strong concern over the slow progress and condemned the existing ineffective structures designed to combat such violence.

The statement highlighted that women and girls continue to face significant insecurity, with reports of rape, gang rape, and other forms of sexual assault on the MJF called for a stronger commitment from the state to ensure the security of women and girls and to prevent violence and child marriage by making local committees functional and accountable.

The statement also said current institutions and legal frameworks have failed to ensure justice for survivors, with the conviction rate for rape remaining low at just 2-3 percent.

MJF also demanded the launch of a national campaign to challenge victimblaming and promote respect for women.

Women and girls deserve to live in safety, security, and without discrimination in the "New Bangladesh", the statement said.

Specific laws needed to combat cyber harassment

Discussants tell roundtable

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

There is an absence of a clear legal framework and proper definitions when it comes to cyber violence against women, speakers said at an event yesterday. They urged for specific legislation to combat such crimes

The roundtable, titled "Scanning the Horizon: Addressing Cyber Violence against Women and Youth Through Policy and Awareness", was jointly organised by UNDP and The Daily Star at The Daily Star Centre.

> Anowarul Haq, assistant resident representative at NDP, said digital violence is a reality we cannot ignore.

"As the legal framework is weak and there is no clear definition of cyber violence, this issue must be addressed under specific legislation," he

He urged the government to strengthen law enforcement agencies through specialised training, recruit gender-sensitive personnel, incorporate cyber violence awareness into school curricula.

Supreme Court lawyer Barrister Jyotirmov Barua criticised the lack of clarity regarding digital rights and laws.

"Our laws fail to define and address globally recognised forms of cyber violence, let alone ensure justice... We haven't even established the National Rezwan Islam, regional editor at Global Voices, stressed the absence of institutional policies on cyber violence.

"A comprehensive policy is urgently needed in organisations," he said. Investments are necessary to create safer digital spaces, he added. Sharmin Ahmed, senior president at Mutual Trust Bank, linked a lack of digital literacy to harassment and fraud in cyberspace. She called for private sector involvement in enhancing digital literacy. UNDP Research Analyst Faisal Bin Majid urged women to remain vigilant and resilient against growing cyber Sharmin Islam, gender team lead at UNDP, said her organisation is working to bridge the digital divide. "Women forms face new harassment regularly, even while engaging in e-commerce. When they seek police help, a lack of expertise often worsens their problems," said. She she advocated for smarter policing victim counselling services.

Misinformation and disinformation targeting women, particularly during elections, were also discussed. Qadaruddin Shishir, fact-check editor at AFP, said such tactics are used for personal vengeance or political gain.

"Alarmingly, the state was previously involved in spreading disinformation. and now political parties and groups are adopting these tactics," he said.

The lack of counselling services for victims was highlighted by Maliha Tabassum, assistant professor at the Department of Mass Communication and Journalism at Bangladesh University of Professionals. She called for culturally driven programmes and a shift in the mindset of law enforcement.

Stop bullying, misinformation targeting women Speakers tell event STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Women must be given adequate space in politics and the freedom to express their opinions without falling victim to rumours or mob justice on social media, speakers said at an event yesterday.

The event, titled "Unmasking Violence: Combating Misinformation, Disinformation, and Cyberbullying", was jointly organised by USAID and Dhaka Tribune as part of the 16 Days of Activism Against Gender-Based Violence campaign at the capital's Krishibid Institution Bangladesh Auditorium.

Umama Fatema, coordinator of the Anti-Discrimination Students' Movement, talked about the online harassment faced by female students and mothers who were at the forefront of recent mass protests.

They have been subjected to derogatory comments about their clothing, behaviour, and speech on social media. The political space is already underserved for women, and the politics of misinformation and rumours has made the situation worse," she said.

Barrister Mitin Sanjana, a Supreme Court lawyer and researcher, criticised the inadequacies in Bangladesh's cyber security laws. "Girls are particularly vulnerable to cyberbullying, yet only one in 100 victims seek legal help. Often, police dismiss these cases as minor, while instances of victim-blaming and character assassination remain rampant, with no legal protection against such actions. The laws require urgent reform," she said.

Sirazum Munira, former lead member of the Grassroot Network of the Youth Policy Forum, said 89 percent of cyberbullying victims in Bangladesh are aged between 18 and 30, with 73.4 percent not seeking legal

She identified deepfake and generative AI technologies, lack of digital literacy, and insufficient fact-checking infrastructure as significant challenges. "Pornography, offensive messages, and derogatory statements dominate crimes against women," she added.

Maliha Tabassum, faculty member of Bangladesh University of Professionals, pointed out that while urban youth are aware of AI, teens at the grassroot level lack digital literacy and often overlook online harassment, enabling perpetrators.

"We need to raise awareness at the personal level," she
