affect households directly as the National Board of Revenue collects nearly 65 percent of the revenue from indirect taxes like VAT.
For example, though plastic items have become an integral part of households, the government has doubled the VAT rate on plastic tableware, kitchenware, and also hygiene products and toiletries to 15 percent from 7.5 percent.
Besides, a 10 percent supplementary duty has been imposed on over-the-top (OTT) platform services for fiscal 2025-26, increasing costs at the users' end.
The move comes as the popularity of OTT platforms is growing, driven by increased smartphone penetration, availability of internet, and rising demand for localised contents.
On the other hand, source tax on broadband services will be reduced to 5 percent from 10 percent.
There will also be VAT exemptions on environment-friendly items such as plates and cutlery made of clay, and plant-based materials with biodegradable components.

Stability takes priority over bold reforms leaving office, and here's what the next government should carry forward.' Since this is an interim government, it should offer a roadmap," he said.

When asked about initiatives targeting youth, he pointed to allocations including a Tk 100 crore self-employment programme, Tk 405 crore for start-up support, and Tk 100 crore for a "Youth Festival".
"The idea seems to be: if a young entrepreneur comes forward with a business idea -- say, starting an e-commerce platform, opening a small shop, or driving for a ride-sharing service -- the government will support the financing."
On social safety net measures, Hussain noted that the major programmes like allowances for elderly women and employment generation for the poor have seen some expansion. Allowances are increased by an average of Tk 50, and coverage is expected to grow. There is also Tk 4,166 crore allocated for free healthcare services and Tk 1,000 crore for vaccination programmes.
Minimum wage growth has also been raised from 5 percent annually to 9 percent. "All of these measures benefit the poor," the economist said.
He also observed that growth and inflation projections in this year's budget are more realistic, while there was a significant disconnect between macroeconomic projections and ground reality in the past.
Birupaksha Paul, economics professor at the State University of New York, also said the "brief and restrained" budget's brevity marks a departure from the verbose and often overly ambitious targets of previous years.
"This budget is economical in its outlook, which is a positive shift," he noted. "It avoids unnecessary verbosity and presents a more grounded fiscal plan."
A notable milestone, he said, is that Bangladesh's GDP is projected to cross the $500 billion mark for the first time.
However, he expressed concern over the narrow fiscal deficit target of 3.6 percent of GDP, the lowest in recent years, arguing it could be misleading given weak revenue performance. "When revenue collection is already weak, using the fiscal deficit as a share of GDP to assess fiscal stance becomes problematic," he cautioned.
He was also critical of the outgoing fiscal year's budget execution, noting that despite ample time, the government failed to deliver efficient spending. "The government had nearly the entire fiscal year to demonstrate performance, yet it failed to show extraordinary efficiency," he said.

Gunmen kill 25 in restive central Nigeria state

AFP, Jos
Gunmen killed 25 people in two attacks across north-central Nigeria's Benue state over the weekend, local authorities told AFP yesterday, the latest violence in a region known for deadly land disputes and reprisals.
Attackers killed 14 people on Sunday in the community of Ankpali, said Adam Ochega, chairman of the Apa local government council, warning that "there are still some threats here and there".
Muslim ethnic Fulani nomadic herders have long clashed with settled farmers, many of whom are Christian, in Benue over access to land and resources.
In a recent report, Amnesty International tallied 6,896 people killed over the last two years in Benue, part of Nigeria's so-called Middle Belt, a mixed-religious region where such disputes often take on a sectarian dimension.
A police spokeswoman confirmed the attack but did not provide a toll.
Contacted by telephone, resident Ajija Moses said the attackers stormed the community around 6:00 pm, blaming armed Fulani men who were "shooting sporadically".
In a similar attack Sunday evening on Naka village, of Gwer West local government area, 11 people were killed by what authorities said were suspected Fulani militias.
"So far we have recovered 11 dead bodies and five people are confirmed injured," Gwer West council chairman Ormin Victor told AFP.
Last month, 44 people were killed in a span of four days in Gwer West.
Motives for the violence in that attack were not clear, but Victor blamed the "coordinated attacks" on Fulani cattle herders.
Resident Amineh Vincent said the village continued to live in fear.
"The attackers invaded our community... were shooting anyhow, they killed many people," he told AFP.

"What's troubling is that operational expenditures did not decrease accordingly. This reflects inefficiency on the part of the government," he added.
Fahmida Khatun, executive director of the Centre for Policy Dialogue, told a briefing at its Dhaka office yesterday that the most concerning issue is the reduction in allocation for three crucial sectors in the Annual Development Programme: education, health, and agriculture.
The reduction in agriculture is especially critical due to its direct link to food security, she said.
The CPD official also said lower-middle-income people will have to pay higher tax rates, while high-income groups will not see an increase due to changes in the tax slabs, which reflects a form of discrimination.
A surprising issue is that the revenue-GDP ratio target was set at just 10.5 percent in the medium-term macroeconomic policy statement—for the year 2035. For the upcoming fiscal year, the target is 9 percent, the CPD official said.
"This reflects a weakening of ambition. How can we ensure development with such low expectations?"
The budget retains a provision for legalising undisclosed income, although the tax rate on such declarations has been increased.
"This provision undermines transparent and honest, regular taxpayers. It demoralises them," Khatun said.
Ashikur Rahman, principal economist at the Policy Research Institute (PRI), said the budget demonstrates accounting precision but lacks economic ambition.
"It underscores the government's intent to maintain macroeconomic stability through fiscal restraint, rather than pursue a bold developmental or counter-cyclical agenda," he said.
Given the current weakness of the fiscal framework, characterised by low revenue mobilisation, rising debt servicing liabilities, and declining foreign aid disbursements, the budget takes a cautious posture.
"The emphasis is clearly on austerity and consolidation, signalling that the government is prioritising stabilisation over stimulus," Ashikur said.
Selim Raihan, executive director of the South Asian Network on Economic Modeling, said the budget shows a genuine attempt to address discrimination and investment gaps, but remains confined by structural limitations.
"I thought something new would be offered, but the effort to introduce change was made within the confines of an old structure," he said.
He warned that the flaws of the existing structure will continue to haunt this budget, while the incentives are not sufficient to revive stagnant private sector investment.

Not much for youth employment

"Without that, budget allocations alone won't solve the employment crisis."
Ahmed stressed the need for a comprehensive, future-oriented employment strategy aligned with ongoing transformations in the industrial and labour markets.
"We are witnessing fundamental changes in the nature of work due to automation and global shifts. Isolated initiatives cannot tackle youth unemployment -- what we need is an integrated national approach involving skills development, industry demand, financing, marketing and access to infrastructure," he added.
Prof Sayema Haque Bidisha, who teaches economics at Dhaka University, said the allocation for young entrepreneurs, the emphasis placed on various training programmes and the proposal to strengthen and establish training centres are commendable steps.
However, she said she is not clear about modalities of the Tk 100 crore Tarunyer Uthshob project.

"While the allocation sounds impressive, the key concern is on what will be the structure of this festival. If it becomes just a ceremonial event, its impact may be limited."
If the festival is designed to be employment-oriented -- focused on skill-building, entrepreneurship, internships, and job creation -- then it could be a truly meaningful initiative, she added.
Rizwanul Islam Khan, former special employment adviser to the International Labour Organisation (ILO), also expressed scepticism about Tarunyer Uthshob.
"I am not clear what impact it would have on creating jobs for youths."
He acknowledged the potential of the Tk 100 crore fund for youth entrepreneurs but emphasised the need for impartial execution.
However, only allocating some money and initiating a programme will not address the core unemployment issues.

"What we need is a comprehensive strategy. Without this, meaningful solutions will not emerge," he added.
Each year, around 2.2 million young people enter the workforce. Of them, around 1 million go abroad for employment, said Rajekuzzaman Ratan, a labour rights activist.
"But for the remaining ones, there is no clear employment policy -- not in last year's budget and not in this one either," he said, adding that many young people are being forced into jobs far below their qualifications.
The youth entrepreneur loan scheme might worsen debt burdens without real job creation, he said.
"In a fragile and vulnerable economy like ours, giving someone a Tk 5 lakh loan and expecting them to become an entrepreneur is unrealistic. It could simply increase their debt burden," he said.
before the implementation of the July proclamation would not be appropriate.
He said that if the election date is announced before the July proclamation is out, the reforms would be disrupted.
"The July proclamation will outline the framework for governing Bangladesh in the future and fundamental reforms to the governance system. Once the proclamation is finalised, we will provide our party's opinion on when we want the election," he said.
Ganosamhati Andolon Chief Coordinator Zonayed Saki demanded a roadmap to reforms, the election and trial for the July atrocities.
Several political parties including Communist Party of Bangladesh, Socialist Party of Bangladesh, Biplobi Workers Party, urged the government to not allow a humanitarian corridor to provide aid to the people in

"We have already reached consensus on many issues," said Yunus, also chair of the consensus commission.
The h e commission was formed to review and finalise reform proposals.
The first round of talks was held with 33 political parties, between February 15 and May 19.
"The remaining differences from the first round can be narrowed so that we can include more points of agreement in our July Charter.
The charter will truly be a national document," Yunus said at the meeting yesterday.
The second phase of talks comes as part of the Consensus Commission's effort to bring political parties together on key questions of electoral and governance reforms.
BNP Standing Committee member Salahuddin Ahmed said there was no reason for the national election to be delayed beyond December.
There is no reform that cannot be done within a month, he said. "We believe that it is possible to hold the national election within December. We must first identify the urgent reforms needed, especially those related to elections, and implement them through consensus."
If there is agreement, all amendments, except for constitutional ones, can be implemented within a month through executive orders and even circulars, he said.

"Therefore, there is no valid reason for the elections to be delayed beyond December."

Jamaat-e-Islami Nayeb-e-Ameer Syed Abdullah Muhammad Taher said that if the chief adviser announced a suitable timeframe between December and April, political parties would focus on their election preparations.
"From December to April, if you set a date at a suitable time, we believe concerns and unease among the public will be alleviated. Political parties will focus on their election preparations, and there will be no possibility of any transitional uncertainty," he said.
Regarding the elections, he further said, "We have requested other parties not to be too rigid about a particular date."
NCP Convener Nahid Islam said announcing the election date
